This video shows you what you need to know about building a country place. Here we talk about the land, where to place barns and house, and other considerations to think about when planning your home. Advertising - Continue reading below the advertisement - Continue reading below the advertisement - Continue reading below With all the information (and inspiration) in magazines and on the web, it is easier and more affordable than ever to decorate your home yourself. However, if you can't visualize what a room or space will look like once it's done, how do you even know where to start? Start by creating a decorating plan. Planning is essential not only to stay on track during a decorating project, but also to finish well. Here's how to create a decorating plan that works. You can buy a sketchbook without a line for this, or a standard laptop will work just fine. Fill with photos of the pieces, furniture, artwork or accessories you like; stick in paint and fabric samples or colors you are attracted to; write down all the other inspiring ideas that come to mind. You should start to notice a certain style and the color palette emerge. Many designers will make you do this first, but looking for ideas before deciding what to do can help you see your existing furniture and décor in a whole new light. What's in your notebook that you want to integrate into your space? What DIY ideas have you come across that might work for you? Can you transform one of your existing parts? To keep you out of serious financial trouble, you need to decide whether you have $15 or $15,000 for your decorating project before you start. Use your list of priorities to formulate your budget. To make your project more affordable and manageable, you may want to break down your project into steps. Also, are there some things you already have that you can reuse? Or if you have a few things to clear, have a garage sale or list them on Craigslist or eBay. This is where your inspiring thoughts become more of a reality. A billboard cut in half will work very well. Start removing some of your favorite ideas from your laptop and place them on your board, leaving space between your items. Mix and match until you reach the look you want, then stick down. That's where you'll make your final decisions. It doesn't matter how much you liked it on your board if it didn't fit into your space. To make final decisions, use the painter's tape to hide the seats, the placement of the furniture or where works of art or shelves. Once you've decided what items will be in your room, start looking for prices and availability of your items on your board. (Tip: If you have chosen a $2,000 bed but have a total budget of $500, look for alternatives or reproductions.) Write item sources and prices on your board next to the item. Now you have a design board, which is basically your decorating plan! A warning note here: Don't plan off out of all the fun. Leave room in your budget for a few pulses you will inevitably meet while shopping. The opinions expressed by the entrepreneurial contributors are theirs. A business plan is a written description of the future of your business, a document that indicates what you plan to do and how you plan to do it. If you write a paragraph on the back of an envelope describing your business strategy, you have written a plan, or at least the germ of one. Business plans are inherently strategic. You start here today with some resources and capabilities. And you want to get there, one point in the future (usually three to five years), when your business will have a different set of resources and capabilities as well as greater profitability and increased assets. Your plan shows how you will get from here to there. If you're looking to make some extra money on the side by starting your own business (even while working another job), don't get caught up in all the hype about developing an elaborate and complicated business plan. While writing a small business plan can certainly help, this not a guarantee of success. Running your small business really comes down to identifying and focusing on these 3 simple elements: 1. Your product or service The first thing you need to clarify before starting your own business is the product or service you offer. It doesn't need to be an amazing new technology or service that no one else provides. These things may work well in some cases, but it is also possible that the reason no one offers the product or service you think is because there is no demand for Think about your strengths, skills and hobbies. What are you going to do right now? These skills may be related to your current job, but they don't have to be. If you plan to capitalize on these skills, they should be something you actually enjoy doing because you are going to give some free time to your secondary business. If you make yourself unhappy by doing something you hate, you are not likely to stay with it for long. However, if you just need the extra money for a short time, loving the idea is not a necessity - it just needs to be something for which people will pay you. Need ideas? Look around to the successful businesses in your area. If someone else makes money on a certain product or service, chances are good that you can too. What for? Because you already know that there are paying customers out there! You can then focus on offering a better version of this product or service or offering it at a lower price (or both!). For a secondary business, keep it simple - tax preparation, child care, pet care, or anything else you can find in your local yellow pages. 2. Your target customers The next thing you need to understand is who your customers are. Who are the people who (1) need your service or product and (2) are willing to pay for it? This requires some thought and research on your part, but it is absolutely essential to your success earning extra money from a small home business. Plus, you don't want to waste time tracking down bad customers. Zoning your target customers ensures you use your time and resources wisely and increases your chances of success. To determine your target customers, it's helpful to start by thinking about your particular competitive advantage (quality, price, convenience). This will help you focus more on the people most likely to buy from you—those who may be looking for a better, cheaper or more convenient version of the product or service you will offer. Then take the time to talk to people you think fit your target. Ask them what they want or need, then adjust and refine your ideas to match your potential customers' responses. You can also discuss pricing and marketing ideas with them if that seems appropriate. 3. How you will reach your target customers (aka marketing) Finally, you need to understand how you are going to let your target customers know that you are in business, what you are offering, and why they should choose you instead of the competition. It's about marketing - essentially, getting the word out to the people who most likely to buy from you. The easiest place to start is with people you already know need your product or service - especially if you know they are unhappy with their current source. Call them, take them to lunch or send them a well-designed email that will help. Don't forget to focus on what you can do for them and the benefits they will receive, not the other way around. If you don't have a lot of capital to finance your start-up, start-up, or cost-free methods for marketing your business. A website may be useful, but it is not always necessary. Volunteering in the community or in organizations related to your business can be a great way to get some visibility. Attractive and well-placed prospectuses can work for certain types of businesses and cost almost nothing. And there's always Facebook and Craigslist to spread the word for free. Finally, don't forget the traditional media. Radio, newspapers, television and online advertising are all possibilities depending on your business model, product or service (and your budget, of course). But don't just throw money at many different types of advertising in the hope that something will work. Think about your target customers again and the most likely ways they're looking for your service or meeting your ads. Test your ideas to understand what works and stop approaches that don't work. Last word By focusing on these three fundamental aspects of your business plan, you can exponentially increase your chances and your degree of success. It's easy to get caught up in a bunch of nit-picky, time-wasting activities and busy work as you seek to become a home business entrepreneur. Instead, focus on finding a business idea that works for you and for which you have the skills, target a specific set of customers, and then find the best ways to reach those customers and get paid. It's a simple formula, but it works. Works.
